

Gregory Rodriguez
Of Counsel
Best Best & Kreiger, LLP

Working out of Best Best & Kreiger's Washington, D.C. office, Gregory Rodriguez uses his unique experience working on Capitol Hill and as in-house counsel for a transportation planning agency to provide legal and regulatory guidance concerning federal grant and contracting requirements, and monitors, counsels and advocates for clients on federal legislation, rulemakings and funding opportunities related to transportation infrastructure.

Greg's practice includes providing information, policy insight and legal assistance on the regulation and incorporation of emerging transportation technologies into our transportation network, including autonomous vehicles and aerial drones. His practice includes advising on contracting and procurement issues involved with innovative pilot projects, including ridesharing partnerships with public agencies. Greg regularly writes and speaks on policy and legal issues involving technology and innovation, and encourages smart planning to ensure new technologies complement public transportation systems.

Greg is well versed on the various contracting options available to public agencies and takes a hands-on approach to ensure a successful project delivery on public construction projects, including large transportation infrastructure projects. Greg previously served as in-house counsel for the San Diego Association of Governments, where he worked on the Mid-Coast Corridor Transit Project.

Before attending law school at the James E. Rogers College of Law at the University of Arizona, Greg was a staff member for U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein in Washington, D.C., where he provided legislative support for issues related to the environment, energy and water. Greg has an undergraduate degree from Stanford University.
